

I enjoy listening to XM Satellite Radio and the programming options they provide. I am eagerly anticipating the addition of local traffic and weather to my area later this year. Since subscribing, I have found the variety and quality of programming available on satellite radio to be unmatched, especially compared to local broadcast radio.

The simple fact that I am willing to pay for a service like satellite radio should allow satellite companies, like XM to provide whatever content their subscribers are looking for.

Competitors, such as the companies the National Association of Broadcasters represent should be encouraged to innovate and modify the product they produce to make it more appealing rather than trying to get regulation passed to prevent competition.

Respectfully,

David Royer